GENERAL INFORMATION

Title: Service agreement for four Analytical Ultracentrifuges

BACKGROUND INFORMATION

The National Institute of Biomedical Imaging and Bioengineering (NIBIB), Laboratory of Dynamics of Macromolecular Assembly (LDMA) specializes in developing biophysical methods to study macromolecular interactions, protein structure and function, and nanoparticles, in the pursuit of biomedical research to improve public health according to the mission of NIH. The primary tool for LDMA's research is the analytical ultracentrifuge (AUC). In general, these centrifuges can spin samples at speeds up to 60,000 rpm while collecting data in less than one second intervals using both laser and UV light systems to track the movement of molecules in solutions. It should be noted that this is not a common high-speed ultracentrifuge. Due to the delicate complexity of the optics system and its integration with data collection software and other internal components of the AUC, there are precise specifications that must be met to ensure proper data collection. These instruments require detailed and exact service maintenance, replacement parts and repairs. Our lab operates several Analytical Ultracentrifuges that have been critical to both in house research and collaborative projects, contributing significantly to advances in biochemistry, immunology, and molecular biology
